my memory, all the while, what unforeseen calamities might not have befallen me, chasing in my mad frenzy a thing so delusive and ultramundane, a will-o'-the-wisp of some unknown world. From the above occurrence, I am inclined to infer that there must be certain definite rules or laws regulating the movements and conduct of the Supernals, so that the forces that are working there, may not transgress their specified limits; or else confusion and chaos only would have been the outcome of their capricious and indiscriminate interference, off and on, in matters not strictly within their province.

Our world and theirs are two distinctly separate spheres, with a dielectric partition between them, that does not allow of any easy interpenetration. It is because of this dielectric difference, that it has become possible for both parties to maintain their respective identities, keeping intact their distinctive features on either side of existence.

Though however there is this line of demarcation between the two worlds, for all practical purposes, we must not forget at the same time, that there is a synthetic principle that runs
